SAVORGNAN, F. Demografia di guerra e altri saggi. (Bologna: Zanichelli. 1921. Pp. 221. 12 l.)

During the war years and after, the author was a frequent contributor to various periodicals of articles on vital statistics, now reprinted in this volume. One of the longer of these articles discusses the forces which make for differences in the movement of population in different times and places. It serves as a kind of introduction to the rest. Several controversial articles on the nationality of peoples in the disputed Adriatic countries are so bound up with the contemporary war situation that the value of reprinting them may be questioned. A discussion of infant mortality during the year of the war is of more enduring interest. This also may be said of several of the nine succeeding short articles. They reveal, for example, the relative immunity of the English population from destructive war influences, the decline of the population of France, the continued expansion of the population of Italy.
